The dialogue yielded robust ethical reflection, including an atypical discussion of the potentially beneficial role of suffering to the human condition. Participants also discussed the limits of technology with regard to the manipulation of emotional states and the implications of this for community. Dialogues that engage participants at varying levels of identity can open up new lines of questioning and debate that go beyond typical policy considerations.